What does this mean for Amnesty?

This year Amnesty International is embarking on its new global strategy (Taking Injustice Personally: Strategic Goals 2016-2019) that seeks to address the biggest challenges the human rights movement is facing today.

Our commitment to mount a forceful response to these crises drives us to learn, to innovate and to steadily adapt the way we approach and win human rights change. The defining processes of global transition and global strategy development have further crystallized our approach to both human rights impact and accountability. It is an approach that emphasizes and balances: agility and persistence, expertise and collective power.

So, for us accountability is a commitment to doing all our work in ways that:

- Strengthen the wider human rights movement - our partners, communities and networks -
- Improve our joint capacity to create sustainable change at local, national, global levels.

To keep us in check as we walk this path, our Impact and Learning system accompanies the delivery of our programmes of work at all levels: national, regional and global. The system features annual deep-dive reviews with our partners and other stakeholders and global strategic groups charged with trends scanning responsibilities. It is designed for increasing strategy adaptation, collaborative analysis of successes and failures, and external feedback.
